NJ AVIATORS TO GET STATE-OF-THE-ART AVIATION FACILITY

Story by Army Staff Sgt. Wayne Woolley, New Jersey Department of Military and Veterans Affairs, Public Affairs

The Soldiers of the New Jersey Army National Guard have flown their feet of UH-60 Blackhawk helicopters on combat missions in Iraq and to support humanitarian relief operations in Panama and Kosovo. They've flown dignitaries from Vice President Joe Biden to the federal agents investigating the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks. They've battled forest fires and were the first aircraft launched for search and rescue operations following hurricanes Floyd, Irene and Sandy.

Consequently, a ceremonial groundbreaking was held March 8 at Joint Base McGuire-Dix-Lakehurst for a 143,000 square-foot aviation facility that will house, maintain and dispatch New Jersey's feet of UH-60s from a central facility, replacing two smaller and outdated flight centers in West Trenton and the Joint Base.

"This is going to be a first-class flight facility for first-class Soldiers," said Brig. Gen. Michael L. Cunniff, the commander of the National Guard and Adjutant General of New Jersey. "We will finally have the caliber of building that matches the caliber of Soldiers who are part of New Jersey Army Guard aviation."

The new facility is scheduled to be completed in October 2014 and will feature an energy efficient design and 10 maintenance bays. The $43 million facility will be home to 60 full-time and 200 Traditional Drilling Guardsmen of the 1st Battalion of the 150th Aviation, which flies the state's UH-60s as well as the smaller OH-58 Kiowa Warrior.

Cunniff was joined in the ceremonial groundbreaking by the 150th Aviation leadership, the leadership of the Joint Base, including the commander, Col. John Wood as well as U.S. Reps. Jon Runyan (R-3rd. Dist) and Chris Smith (R-4th Dist).

Smith, who led the successful 1995 effort to remove Naval Air Engineering Station Lakehurst from the Base Realignment and Closure List, noted that the vision of a consolidated aviation facility for New Jersey Army aviation dated back nearly 20 years.

His brother, Mike Smith, a now retired Army National Guard colonel, was among the Army aviation commanders who saw a need for one aviation facility.

Smith credited the leadership of the National Guard for convincing the Department of Defense and members of Congress of the need for the facility.

"Co-location and consolidation will ensure that the vital security and humanitarian missions of the New Jersey Guard continue to be performed with world class excellence," Smith said. "Today the work begins on the Army Aviation Support Facility resulting in new construction jobs for a struggling local economy and when completed, a substantially better place for army guard aviation to perform its critical missions."

Runyan, who serves on the House Armed Services Committee and helped secure funding for the project, said it would be used by Soldiers who have demonstrated their value.

"The men and women of the 1-150th Aviation Battalion have proven their capabilities and commitment to service both at home and abroad," he said.

Albanians gain insight into NJNG OCS program

Story and photos by Airman 1st Class Kellyann Novak, 108th Wing Public Affairs

Looking to build an Officer Candidate School program within the Albanian military, five officers from the Albanian Ministry of Defense and Albanian Armed Forces visited the New Jersey National Guard's Training Center at Sea Girt, March 9, through the NJ State Partnership Program.

The five delegates' goal is to emulate the OCS program of the NJNG. They hope to accomplish this by visiting an OCS orientation being conducted at the Training Center and discussing future training opportunities for their officer candidates.

Brig. Gen. Bardhyl Hoxha, AAF Training and Doctrine commander, wants to incorporate the NJNG OCS program and the U.S. military's doctrines into their armed forces. In addition, Hoxha said one of the most important aspects he would like Albanian officers to learn from the U.S. and OCS is a change in mentality and a better understanding of the U.S. military's way of life.

OCS is an intense leadership training ground where the mission is to train, educate, branch, and commission the best qualified officers in order to produce agile and adaptive junior officers capable of leading soldiers upon arrival at first unit of assignment. The state OCS is a 16 to 18 month program, one weekend a month, but the plan for the Albanian candidates would be to follow the Federal OCS program, training every day for three to four months. There are numerous details to be hammered out within the program to allow the Albanian candidates to benefit the most from OCS. Hoxha said the AAF would like to look at the U.S. program and eliminate some information that may be of no practical use to an Albanian officer and possibly add other training that would be valuable to their candidates.

Cultural differences play a huge role in preparing Albanian officer candidates to come to the U.S. and participate in training. Hoxha said the candidates would be university students graduating with a bachelor's degree and would be required to have education in the English language. They would attend basic training first and then approximately two months' worth of additional training before being selected for OCS in the U.S.

Col. Vladimir Avdiaj, Strategic Policies Director, was one of the first Albanian officers to participate in training in the U.S. He is interested in how the U.S. OCS will change the AAF's way of training and educating young officers. In addition, Avdiaj said he would like to see Albanian non-commissioned officers training in the U.S. in the future if all goes well with the OCS program.
