NJARNG armory renamed in honor of local veteran

Retired New Jersey Army National Guard Col. Leonard J. Tharney speaks to the audience and family members about his memories of working with Wildwood resident Lt. Col James F. Bakalow during the Cape May Armory dedication Sept. 16. The Armory now bears the name of the World War II Army Air Corps pilot and later field artillery commander. (Photo by 1st Sgt. The young Army Air Corps pilot made two unsuccessful bombing runs over his target and found himself low on fuel and under heavy fire. Instead of returning to base, James F. Barkalow turned the twin-engine A-20J bomber around for a third pass, evaded the fire from German anti-aircraft guns and found his target.

Years later, Barkalow's daughter, Sharon Ellis, asked why he made that third pass with a young family back home in New Jersey and so much to live for.

"I knew if I didn't do it someone else was going to have to come back and do the work I should have done," he replied, Ellis recalled her father telling her before he died in 2009 at the age of 89.

The people who joined Sharon Ellis on Sept. 16 for the renaming of the New Jersey Army National Guard Armory in Cape May Court House in honor of Lt. Col.

James Barkalow said his heroics in battle over Europe all those years ago exemplified the life he led.

For his actions as a pilot with the 410th Bomb Group, Barkalow received the Distinguished Flying Cross and nine Air Medals. But the people who gathered for the armory dedication said Barkalow made the biggest impact in New Jersey, over a 28 year career that included a stint as the longest serving battalion commander in the history of the New Jersey Army National Guard.

"He was very straight with people," said Leonard J. Tharney, a retired colonel who was mentored by Barkalow before taking command of the unit in Cape May County. Barkalow's career with the National Guard ended in 1980 culminating with his command of a company of the first nuclear-capable surface-to-surface missiles in the U.S. arsenal.

"He had an uncommon amount of loyalty and patriotism," Tharney said.

"When everyone else took a day off he was still working."

Barkalow's history with the armory began before it actually existed, when he and a group of WWII veterans and local concerned citizens lobbied to have a retired from the drill center that currently houses the 253rd Transportation Company. He presided over its dedication in 1961 and in his honor the 254th Trans. Co. stood in formation during the ceremony that dedicating their drill center in Barkalow's honor.

Brig. Gen. James J. Grant, Chief of the New Jersey National Guard Joint Staff, said that it was poignant that the ceremony was held the week of the 11th anniversary of the Sept. 11th terror attacks because the heroic deeds of service members must be preserved by those most able to honor them properly.

"We're actively remembering a member of the New Jersey National Guard," Grant said. "Although he is gone, he will always be actively remembered. That's important."

Store supervisor displays patriotism, support for military members

By Donna Clementoni, New Jersey committee of Employer Support of the Guard and Reserves

The supervisor of the Somers Point, N.J., ShopRite store made sure that his shoppers remembered the loss and sacrifice resulting from the 9/11 attacks.

With the help of one of the area soda distribution managers, Bob Wode initiated the creation of a 9/11 memorial in the lobby of the busy store. The visual exhibit carried the message, “9-11. Never Forget”, which was designed out of strategically placed boxes of soda cans.

The patriotic display was just another shining example of how the popular area food stores, part of the Wake Fern parent company, supports the community and embraces the men and women of the U.S. military who fight for our freedom.

“From its beginning, ShopRite has been a company built on giving back,” said Wode.

He personally embodies the generous spirit of the company who, as responsible members of the community, take great pride in every outreach program, every donation and every act of volunteerism.

“They participate,” said Wode. “Not because we have to, but because we truly believe that we are neighbors, and we are a part of one family.”

Consequently, Wode’s creativity and support for area veterans and active military members was recognized by the New Jersey Committee of Employer Support of the Guard and Reserve (ESGR) by presenting the district manager with a Seven Seals Award.

The award, depicting the heraldry of the seven branches of service they represent, is given at the discretion of the ESGR State chairman to honor those employers that are exemplary in their support of the American military. The men and women, citizen soldiers as they are known, of the National Guard and U.S. Reserves represent 48 percent of the U.S. military.

Furthermore, ESGR, a Department of Defense organization, consists mostly of volunteers, who seek to create a culture where all American employers value the military service and sacrifice of their employees. They accomplish this by advocating relevant initiatives, recognizing outstanding support, increasing awareness of applicable laws and resolving conflict between employers and service members.

Wounded Warrior Ed Afanador was present during the award presentation with his service dog, Arnie. Afanador knows all too well the loss and sacrifice that resulted from the World Trade Center attacks. He was deployed with the HHC 1st-114th Mechanized Infantry Battalion of the New Jersey Army National Guard and became disabled by injuries sustained at Ground Zero on the post 9/11 recovery mission. Furthermore, Afanador also has served in the Marine Corps and the 177th Fighter Wing of the New Jersey Air National Guard.

Currently, Afanador is volunteer-peer mentor/alumni with the Wounded Warrior Project and Disabled Sports USA.

Wode has two sons that are in the active military – one is with the U.S. Air Force and the other is serving a three year deployment in Germany with the U.S. Army.

DoD and VA to fund $100 million PTSD and TBI study

The Department of Defense (DoD) and the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) are investing more than $100 million in research to improve diagnosis and treatment of mild Traumatic Brain Injury (mTBI) and Post-traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD).

“At VA, ensuring that our Veterans receive quality care is our highest priority,” said Secretary of Veterans Affairs, Eric K. Shinseki. “Investing in innovative research that will lead to treatments for PTSD and TBI is critical to providing the care our Veterans have earned and deserve.”

The two groups, the Chronic Effects of Neurotrauma Consortium (CENC) and the Consortium to Alleviate PTSD (CAP) will be jointly managed by DoD and VA.

A primary goal of CENC is to establish an understanding of the aftereffects of an mTBI. Potential comorbidities also will be studied; that is, conditions associated with and worsen because of a neurotrauma.

“PTSD and mTBI are two of the most prevalent injuries suffered by our warfighters in Iraq and Afghanistan, and identifying better treatments for those impacted is critical,” said Assistant Secretary of Defense for Health Affairs, Dr. Jonathan Woodson. “These consortia will bring together leading scientists and researchers devoted to the health and welfare of our Nation’s service members and Veterans.”

More than 15 percent of service members and Veterans suffer impaired functioning as a result of PTSD. CAP will study potential indicators of the trauma, as well as prevention strategies, possible interventions, and improved treatments. Biomarker-based research will be a key factor for CAP’s studies.

On Aug. 31, the President signed an executive order to improve access to mental health services for Veterans, service members and military families. As part of that executive order, the President directed the Department of Defense, the Department of Veterans Affairs, the Department of Health and Human Services and the Department of Education to develop a National Research Action Plan that will include strategies to improve early diagnosis and treatment effectiveness for TBI and PTSD. He further directed the Department of Defense and Department of Health and Human Services to conduct a comprehensive mental health study with an emphasis on PTSD, TBI, and related injuries to develop better prevention, diagnosis, and treatment options.

Specific information on the consortia, including the full description of each award, eligibility, and submission deadlines, and General Application Instructions, are posted on the Grants.gov and CDMRP websites (<http://www.grants.gov> and <http://cdmrp.army.mil> , respectively).
