Understanding the MCL Process

Each multicounty litigation is handled in one of three counties: Bergen, Middlesex, or Atlantic. The court that designates a multicounty litigation also assigns it to one of those counties. All future cases in that county as well. The judge assigned to oversee the MCL will prepare an initial case management conference agenda that includes:

- the date of the first case management conference;
- direction to counsel regarding issues they should discuss prior to this initial case management conference;
- instructions regarding notices on the Judiciary web page for multicounty litigation;
- instructions regarding contact with the court;
- obligations regarding preservation of records and e-discovery; and
- a process for the appointment of lead and liaison counsel.

The court will work with federal courts that are handling corresponding litigation. This is called coordination at the federal level. MCL judges also must coordinate discovery efforts with related litigation in other jurisdictions. The MCL judge is not bound by any decision from any other jurisdictions.

MCLs usually have scheduled case management conferences every four to six weeks. Normally, counsel confer prior to the conferences and submit a proposed joint agenda for each conference. The court will:

- ask about ongoing discovery issues;
- set a schedule for motion practice regarding any disputes; and
- set a schedule to complete written discovery, depositions, service of general expert reports.

The goal is to select a pool of cases to then be made ready for trial. From this pool of trial-ready cases, the court selects representative plaintiffs for bellwether trials. The bellwether trials assist in the settlement or disposition of the remaining MCL litigation. Those trials establish trends or common rulings that can predict a potential outcome for the remaining cases.

No two MCLs are the same. Each involves different products, and each has its own unique variables. Counsel can predict the length of time any MCL litigation will last.

Typically, the judge that is assigned the MCL will be the judge overseeing the trial of the cases. The court may allow multiple plaintiffs to present their cases in one trial. First, the court must determine that the trial can be accomplished without undue prejudice to the defendants.
