

List of New Jersey's Biggest Trees

BY SANTIAGO PORCELLA, III

Southern White Cedar (Chamaecyparis thyoides). This tree formerly grew in the great swamp of Green Bank State Forest, New Gretna, and fell in the hurricane of November, 1950. The photo was taken by H. Koster prior to 1920. The man is the late John Simpkins of Green Bank, holding a six-foot, two-man saw. The DBH of this tree was five feet. Photo courtesy of Charles Bell, Lower Bank, New Jersey.

How large are the big trees in New Jersey? Where are they located? The answers to these questions came from many interested citizens and from members of the New Jersey Chapter, Allegheny Section, Society of American Foresters. Especially helpful were the foresters of the Department of Environmental Protection, who aided in measuring many of the trees. Most measurements were made at a point 4½ feet above the ground.

Big trees grow older and eventually die. Sometimes storm damage, insects, or diseases may hasten death. If, in the future, you find that one of the trees on this list is dead or has been destroyed, please inform the N.J. Bureau of Forestry. It will help keep the list up to date. Also, information about trees greater in circumference than those listed will be welcomed.

Trees are important to the people of New Jersey. Many landowners grow trees as a crop just as they grow corn and potatoes. Such trees are scientifically managed to produce high-quality lumber, veneer logs, piling for shipyards, and fenceposts. Trees of lower quality are harvested for paper, fireplace wood, and other products.

Thirty-eight percent of the State is classified as commercial forest land. About 35,000 cords of pulpwood, 1,448,000 board feet of veneer logs, 13,766,000 board feet of sawlogs, and 1,264,000 cubic feet of other products are produced annually. Altogether, our homegrown wood products plus those brought into the State for remanufacture provide employment for about 4,500 persons.

Trees serve many purposes, ranging from wood products and erosion control to cover for birds and wildlife. Trees make our homes and environment more livable and beautiful. They are a renewable natural resource.
