ANG paves way for flying crew chief

Story by Tech. Sgt. Matt Hecht, 177th Fighter Wing Public Affairs Office

Senior Airman Austin Daniel normally works as a crew chief for high performance fighters, but this year he was seen high over the skies of Atlantic City during the 2014 “Thunder Over the Boardwalk” Air Show as a demonstration pilot.

Since Daniel was five years old, he knew he wanted to fly.

“For his fifth birthday, all he wanted was for me to take him up,” said Austin’s father, Jeff Daniel, a former Air Force T-37 instructor pilot. “Once he was up in the air, he was hooked.”

The junior Daniel began his flying career at 14, and at 16 had a base tour at the 177th Fighter Wing.

“That tour was a huge influence,” said Daniel. “I got to talk to a fighter pilot, and I asked him, what do I need to accomplish to do what you do? He told me to enlist in the Air National Guard, and that’s exactly what I did when I graduated high school.”

In 2009 Daniel graduated from Air Force Basic Training as well as technical training to become an F-16 Fighting Falcon crew chief. At the same time, he had already gotten his commercial pilot’s license and began flying with the Raiders Demonstration Team, based out of Lumberton, N.J.

“The Guard is the best opportunity in the military,” said Daniel. “To have so many options, full-time, part-time, it’s so flexible. I was able to work as a crew chief part-time, finish my college degree in aviation flight technology and fly!”

As a member of the Raiders, Daniel relies on skills he learned in the Air National Guard.

“The Air National Guard was my first experience working in such a large organization, and the skills I learned as a crew chief, like aircraft systems management, have helped me out immensely as a pilot, and also as a team member,” said Daniel. “Being a crew chief and flying as a demonstration pilot actually have a lot in common; there is a huge amount of trust and comradery in both.”

At 23 years old, Daniels has accumulated an amazing 2,000 flight hours. While flying with the Raiders Demonstration Team as a solo pilot, he flies the Yak-52, a hardy Russian-made training aircraft.

“It’s a great aircraft, very fuel efficient and great in formation flying with basic aerobatic maneuvers,” said Daniel.

Daniel recently achieved one of his goals: being hired by a regional airline as a pilot.

“He started flying with the Yak-52, a very complex aircraft,” said his father Jeff. “It was a unique way to learn how to fly, and it translated well with flying crop dusters and now the airlines.”

“Flying in shows like Thunder Over the Boardwalk here in Atlantic City is exciting,” said Daniel. “I used to be that kid, looking up at planes and getting inspired, and it’s an honor that it’s me up there inspiring kids today. Flying the AC air show feels great, it’s real ‘seat of the pants,’ and it’s a beautiful view!”

For the future, Daniel is still looking to the sky, hoping to one day fly fighters for the Air National Guard.

The Army Reserve's 1103rd Main Support Battalion conducted a staff exercise at the New Jersey National Guard's Joint Training and Training Development Center at Joint Base McGuire-Dix-Lakehurst on August 12, 2014.

The Center's officers and non-commissioned officers coached the Battalion through the military decision making process and provided skilled support staff to assist the 1103rd the "crawl" and "walk" phases of the Army Mission Command Training Strategy.

The 1103rd conducted their training using the newly implemented Division eExercise Training and Readiness System, a part of the Army Low Overhead Training Toolkit, which is designed to be a robust, efficient, and cost-effective solution for training staff officers and NCO's in conducting full spectrum scenarios involving major combat operations.

The JT2DC's mission is to enhance the National Guard's overall readiness at the lowest possible expense to the government by employing live, virtual, constructive and gaming environments to maintain a ready and deployable force. The JT2DC is available to facilitate joint training for all branches of the military as well as local, state, federal civilian law-enforcement and civil support agencies. 'Bossman' finally thanks Soldier

By Staff Sgt. Wayne Woolley, DMAVA Public Affairs

It took 62 years, but the Sailor finally got to thank the Soldier who helped save his transport ship from sinking in a typhoon during the Korean War.

The reunion over the telephone between Ray Galloway and Robert H. Yancey was made possible because of an interview Yancey gave the New Jersey National Guard Militia Museum's Carol Fowler as part of her ongoing Oral History Project.

Galloway's daughter found the interview online and it allowed the North Carolina man to finally connect with the man who called him "Bossman" on the night he helped Yancey save the ship.

It all started on an October night in 1951 when a typhoon struck and stranded Galloway's transport ship. Yancey, fresh from a fierce combat tour with the Army's 24th Infantry Regiment, was a passenger on the ship.

The typhoon had turned the ship into a chaotic scene. The ship had become grounded on a coral reef off the coast of Japan. The wind had blown off doors and water was pouring into the vessel. It was going down.

Yancey turned to the closest Sailor and looked at the officer and said: "Bossman, if we don't do something, we ain't getting home." Although Yancey was a Soldier, he'd had experience on ships in distress. The Philadelphia native had served as a Sailor during World War II.

Galloway agreed with Yancey's suggestion that the crew unbolt the tables and use them as barriers to staunch the flow of water from the damaged doors. It worked. Three days later the crew was rescued.

The men went their separate ways. Yancey stayed in the Army, ultimately serving in Vietnam before retiring. He earned several advanced degrees and worked as a teacher in the state prison system. He also became a tireless veterans advocate, serving as the New Jersey Commander of Disabled American Veterans.

For years, his name sat on a piece of paper on Ray Galloway's desk. The retired Naval officer had grudgingly given up his search for Yancey years ago. Then Galloway's daughter found that scrap of paper and asked to hear the story behind it.

An internet search and contact with Fowler was all it took. Galloway made the call. Yancey answered.

For more information, contact retired Col. Larry S. Stroud at LSSSR@prodigy.net. The cutoff date is Aug. 28, 2014.

Air Defense Artillery, comprised 265 Nike Ajax and Nike Hercules missile bases scattered across the United States.

In North Jersey, bases were located in towns such as Middletown, Holmdel, Franklin Lakes and Wayne were part of the New York Defense Area. In South Jersey, batteries in Lumberton, Marlton, Berlin and others were responsible for the Philadelphia Defense Area. A Nike Hercules memorial site is located at Sandy Hook, N.J..

Nike Hercules was included in Strategic Arms Limitation Talks Agreement 1 as an anti-ballistic missile. After the treaty was signed, most Nike sites were deactivated by April 1974.
