NJDOL Awards $1.1M Through First CARE Grant to Boost Access to Worker Benefits and Protections

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

July 29, 2022

TRENTON – The New Jersey Department of Labor and Workforce Development (NJDOL) has awarded $1.1 million through its inaugural Cultivating Access, Rights, and Equity (CARE) grant program to 13 grantees, including four collaboratives, totaling 28 organizations. The CARE grant was created to facilitate equitable outreach, education, and access to New Jersey’s many generous benefits and protections for eligible workers, including Temporary Disability Insurance, Family Leave Insurance, and Earned Sick Leave.

Awardees include community organizations, worker centers, domestic violence agencies, service providers, and faith-based groups who have demonstrated trusted relationships with their communities across the state, as well as culturally specific outreach and education methods and the capacity for linking underserved residents with government benefits and protections.

“We are proud to partner with these distinguished organizations that have demonstrated a commitment to equity in their communities,” said Labor Commissioner Robert Asaro-Angelo. “With the help of their established rapport with specific communities, we look forward to reaching every New Jersey worker to ensure they are aware of all the benefits and protections available to them.”

Grantees will engage in initiatives such as social media and text campaigns, sharing information at community events, providing one-on-one counseling to workers, and conducting trainings, events and presentations. These efforts will focus primarily on populations less likely to access their benefits and protections, such as: women, youth, immigrant, and low-income workers; employees such as laundry, warehouse, food service, domestic, and nail salon workers; individuals with disabilities; victims/survivors of domestic violence; parents; and caregivers. One of the grant program’s goals is to help eliminate disparities in access to paid leave related to race, ethnicity, language, sexual orientation, and gender identity.

“Latinos are the fastest-growing segment of New Jersey’s population, contributing an estimated $46 billion in purchasing power to the state economy; however, they face a multitude of challenges in the workplace,” said Ileana J. Montes, deputy director and general counsel to the Immigration & American Citizenship Organization (IACO). “We commend the NJDOL for the CARE grant as educating the Latino community about their work rights is at the forefront of the solutions, and it goes hand in hand with our mission of educating, empowering, and uplifting immigrant working families, thereby facilitating their integration and inclusion into the American society.”

Said Beatriz Patino-Sherard, economic justice coordinator of the New Jersey Coalition to End Domestic Violence (NJCEDV): “A lack of economic security is the number one reason survivors of domestic violence stay in abusive relationships, which is exacerbated for those in marginalized communities. This partnership with the New Jersey Department of Labor will help the NJCEDV and our programs to ensure that survivors across the state are aware of and able to access their right to paid leave from work without losing their job or income – a critical resource within a survivor’s safety plan.”
