New Jersey's Dragon Soldiers

Story and photos by Staff Sgt. Armando Vasquez, NJ DMAVA public affairs

Their jobs are not the most glamorous in the military but very critical for survival. They have to perform their duties in any type of weather element, and if in a serious situation, most likely they will be suited up in a uniform that can be very uncomfortable in the hot weather.

"It takes a special kind of person to be a Dragon Soldier," said Capt. Leo Magee, company commander 50th Chemical Company. "These Soldiers love this stuff and they have to in order to perform their duties."

What Magee refers to is the job duties of a chemical, biological, radiological, and nuclear (CBRN) operations specialist. The Dragon Soldiers are primarily responsible for defending the country against the threat of CBRN weapons and weapons of mass destruction (WMD).

They accomplish this task by planning, employing and coordinating CBRN defense systems in support of joint and combined arms operations, which include CBRN reconnaissance, biological agent detection, obscurant systems, decontamination, and other CBRN hazard detection and warning.

But what makes this job a little more difficult is the possibility of having to don into MOPP level 4. MOPP, which stands for mission oriented protective posture, are broken into five levels, with level zero being the most passive in which the Soldier only carries their protective gear. At level 4, the Soldier has don his full protective gear, which include over garment, mask and hood, field gear, footwear covers and gloves. And at this level the Soldier is in a very uncomfortable position, not only because of the heat and obstructed view from the mask, but because at this level, most likely they are in the presence of some CBRN agent.

"We are the first to go in to a possible chemical environment," said Sgt. Curtis Baptiste, a CBRN specialist with the 50th Chemical Co. "Our job is to detect any type of chemical. We search and survey the area and then report to higher command our findings."

Utilizing hand-held detection kits or biological integrated detection system (BIDS) vehicles, the Soldiers from the 50th Company perform their jobs that keep other Soldiers safe in the battlefield, said Staff Sgt. Peter Taburas, also a CBRN specialist with the 50th Chemical Co., and a BIDS operator.

Consequently, Taburas, Baptiste and more than 60 Soldiers from the Somerset Armory based unit were practicing their skills July 23 at the Armory. In hot weather, they simulated the detection and decontamination of troops and vehicles as part of their annual training, which ran from July 15-29. Although the scenario was simulated, the process was real as the Soldiers with their gas mask on, sprayed, scrubbed and washed the vehicles to ensure that any chemical agent was removed and the equipment and Soldiers were ready to get back to their mission.

"This is some excellent training," said 1st Lt. Elizabeth Donofrio, executive officer of the 50th Chemical Co. "In our traditional Guard schedule; it is very difficult to train on all the tasks, so we train harder during our annual training."

They know their jobs is very important if a disaster or an attack with WMDs happens in New Jersey, as they would be most likely called up to assist local civil authorities and first responders, as well as the 21st Civil Support Team. The 21st CST's mission is to assess a suspected WMD attack, advice civilian responders on appropriate actions, and facilitate the arrival of additional state and federal military forces.

So critical is the job of these CBRN specialists that Lt. Col. Timothy Metcalf, the 21st CST commander, paid a visit to the Somerset Armory to assess the training of these Dragon Soldiers.

As the only chemical company in the New Jersey National Guard, training to stay mission ready is taken very serious by these Soldiers, said Magee.

"We want to put the Company on the map," said Magee.
