Free or reduced-price beach badges for military personnel

Just in time for the summer, some beach towns in New Jersey will have the option to offer free or reduced-price beach badges to active duty military personnel and their families under a new legislation signed Tuesday, June 21, by Gov. Chris Christie.

Under the old law, towns that require beach badges were only allowed to reduce rates for people 65 and older or certain people with disabilities.

In addition, the old law stated that children under the age of 12 could not be charged for beach badges.

However, some towns were already waiving fees for military members without interference from the state.

Shore-area lawmakers who sponsored the bill said they felt it was important to remove any legal obstacle that might make towns hesitant to offer the courtesy.

The legislation does not require towns to waive the fees, but gives them the option to do so.
